RE: 25-2713 Samantha Stinson, et al v. State of Arkansas
25-2894 Julee Jaeger, et al v. State of Arkansas
25-3311 Christine Benson, et al v. State of Arkansas

Dear Counsel:

The amicus curiae brief of the State of Kentucky and 16 Other States has been filed. If you have not already done so, please complete and file an Appearance form. You can access the Appearance Form at www.ca8.uscourts.gov/all-forms.

Please note that Federal Rule of Appellate Procedure 29(g) provides that an amicus may only present oral argument by leave of court. If you wish to present oral argument, you need to submit a motion. Please note that if permission to present oral argument is granted, the court's usual practice is that the time granted to the amicus will be deducted from the time allotted to the party the amicus supports. You may wish to discuss this with the other attorneys before you submit your motion.

INTERESTS OF AMICI CURIAE¹

The Commonwealth of Kentucky and the 16 undersigned States have a profound interest in the proper interpretation of the Establishment Clause of the First Amendment. For decades, that provision was distorted by the Supreme Court’s three-part test from Lemon v. Kurtzman, 403 U.S. 602, 612–13 (1971). That test “ambitiously attempted to find a grand unified theory of the Establishment Clause.” Am. Legion v. Am. Humanist Ass’n, 588 U.S. 29, 60 (2019) (plurality op.). Yet too often, Lemon led to “results more hostile to religion than anything a careful inquiry into the original understanding of the Constitution could contain.” See Shurtleff v. City of Boston, 596 U.S. 243, 284 (2022) (Gorsuch, J., concurring in the judgment). Not only was Lemon “ahistorical,” its test “invited chaos in lower courts, led to differing results in materially identical cases, and created a minefield for legislators.” Kennedy v. Bremerton Sch. Dist., 597 U.S. 507, 534, 537 (2022) (cleaned up) (citation omitted). With good reason, Lemon’s methodology for interpreting the Establishment Clause has been “abrogated.” Groff v. DeJoy, 600 U.S. 447, 460 & n.7 (2023).

These appeals concern how to treat a Supreme Court decision that applied Lemon’s now-discarded test. That dated decision, which amicus curiae Kentucky remembers all too well, is Stone v. Graham, 449 U.S. 39 (1980) (per curiam). There, the Supreme Court tersely concluded that a Kentucky statute requiring the posting of the

Ten Commandments in public-school classrooms violates the Establishment Clause. Id. at 40–43. There is no dispute that Stone turned on Lemon. As Stone put it, “[w]e conclude that [Kentucky’s law] violates the first part of the Lemon v. Kurtzman test, and thus the Establishment Clause of the Constitution.” Id. at 42–43.

The amici States write to explain why Stone does not support a preliminary injunction as to Arkansas’s law. Even before Lemon was overruled, the Supreme Court had narrowed Stone so that it stood for only a sliver of a proposition. Now that Lemon has been abrogated, the Court should not extend Stone’s reasoning to Arkansas’s law, which can be applied in ways that differ from the situation considered in Stone. When the Supreme Court overruled Lemon, it discarded that case’s methodology for interpreting the Establishment Clause. In Lemon’s place, the Supreme Court “instructed that the Establishment Clause must be interpreted by ‘reference to historical practices and understandings.’” Kennedy, 597 U.S. at 535 (citation omitted). That approach—not Stone—is the proper way to judge the constitutionality of Arkansas’s law.

That approach must account for the reality that “acknowledgements [on public property] of the role played by the Ten Commandments in our Nation’s heritage are common throughout America.” Van Orden v. Perry, 545 U.S. 677, 688 (2005) (plurality op.). More to the point, the Ten Commandments “have historical significance as one of the foundations of our legal system, and for largely that reason, they are depicted in the marble frieze in [the Supreme Court’s] courtroom and other prominent public buildings in our Nation’s capital.” Am. Legion, 588 U.S. at 53. To be sure, the Decalogue has religious significance for many Americans. But a “close look” at our Nation’s history reveals that “[n]o one at the time of the founding [was] recorded as arguing that the use of religious symbols in public contexts was a form of religious establishment.” Shurtleff, 596 U.S. at 287 (Gorsuch, J., concurring in the judgment).

ARGUMENT

Arkansas offers several persuasive reasons why the preliminary injunctions issued below should be reversed. The amici States focus on the district court’s conclusion that “[t]his case begins and ends with Stone.” Stinson v. Fayetteville Sch. Dist. No. 1, 798 F. Supp. 3d 931, 948 (W.D. Ark. 2025). The amici States make three points about Stone. First, they explain that Arkansas’s law can be applied in ways that differ from the situation considered in Stone. Second, they summarize how the Supreme Court cabined Stone’s scope even before Lemon was overturned. And third, they urge the Court not to extend Stone’s narrowed holding to this case but instead to apply the standard mandated by Kennedy.

I. Arkansas’s law can be applied differently than the situation considered in Stone.

Stone arose in the Bluegrass State. In 1978, a Democratic legislator from Louisville introduced, and the Kentucky General Assembly passed, the statute that prompted the case. That law, which remains on the books, instructs a Kentucky state official “to ensure that a durable, permanent copy of the Ten Commandments [is] displayed on a wall in each public elementary and secondary school classroom in the Commonwealth.” Ky. Rev. Stat. § 158.178(1). The law also directs that each display contain the following text in “small print below the last commandment”: “The secular application of the Ten Commandments is clearly seen in its adoption as the fundamental legal code of Western Civilization and the Common Law of the United States.” Ky. Rev. Stat. § 158.178(2).

Shortly after the law’s passage, Kentucky’s Attorney General issued a legal opinion allowing private parties to donate Ten Commandments displays to public schools. In re Honorable Edward L. Fossett, OAG 78-605, 1978 WL 26724, at *2 (Aug. 28, 1978). By the time Stone made it to Kentucky’s high court, a private foundation had reportedly “financed 15,000 framed copies [of the Ten Commandments] which ha[d] been placed in all classrooms in 55 counties and in some classrooms in 48 other counties.” Stone v. Graham, 599 S.W.2d 157, 159 (Ky. 1980) (Lukowsky, J., for reversal). Kentucky’s courts upheld the Ten Commandments law. After a state trial court found the law constitutional, the Supreme Court of Kentucky affirmed by an equally divided vote. 599 S.W.2d at 157 (per curiam). (The vote was equally divided because a Justice recused due to his previous role as the Kentucky Attorney General who issued the above-described legal opinion.)

The U.S. Supreme Court summarily reversed in a 5–4 per curiam opinion.² From beginning to end, the Court applied Lemon—in particular, its first prong. Stone, 449 U.S. at 40–43. Stone can be read no other way. As the Court summarized at the top of its decision: “We conclude that Kentucky’s statute requiring the posting of the Ten Commandments in public schoolrooms had no secular purpose, and is therefore unconstitutional.” Id. at 41. So Stone was all about—and only about—Lemon.

In applying Lemon, Stone rejected Kentucky’s “‘avowed’ secular purpose,” expressed through the statutorily required statement at the bottom of each Ten Commandments display. Id. The Court summarily declared that “[t]he pre-eminent purpose for posting the Ten Commandments on schoolroom walls is plainly religious in nature.”³ Id. The Court, however, qualified that it was not holding that the Ten Commandments can never be displayed or discussed in public schools. It emphasized that “[t]his is not a case in which the Ten Commandments are integrated into the school curriculum, where the Bible may constitutionally be used in an appropriate study of history, civilization, ethics, comparative religion, or the like.” Id. at 42. At the end of its decision, the Court returned to Lemon, reiterating that Kentucky’s law “violates the first part of the Lemon v. Kurtzman test, and thus the Establishment Clause of the Constitution.” Id. at 42–43.

² Two of the dissenters would have granted certiorari and given the case plenary consideration. Stone, 449 U.S. at 43 (Burger, C.J., Blackmun, J., dissenting).

It is unmistakable from Stone that the Court considered only a standalone display of the Ten Commandments along with a short explanatory statement. As a result, Stone did not consider a Ten Commandments display that was situated alongside other historical documents. If anything, Stone conveys that such a display would comport with the Establishment Clause, given its allowance of public schools using the Ten Commandments “in an appropriate study of history, civilization, ethics, comparative religion, or the like.” See id. at 42. So taking Stone at its word, a standalone Ten Commandments display stands on different constitutional footing than a display situated alongside other historical documents.

Arkansas’s law can be applied in ways that differ from the standalone Ten Commandments display considered in Stone. Although Arkansas’s law requires a Ten Commandments display in each classroom and library of an elementary or secondary school, Ark. Code Ann. § 1-4-133(a)(1)(B)(i) & (a)(2)(A), nothing in the statute prohibits a public school from displaying the Ten Commandments as part of a larger display of historical or legal documents. Indeed, Arkansas’s brief (at 54–55) confirms that its law can be applied in exactly this way. So nothing in Arkansas’s law prohibits a public school from displaying the Ten Commandments alongside other displays featuring documents formative to modern law, like Blackstone’s Commentaries or the Supreme Court’s decision in Marbury v. Madison. In addition, although Arkansas’s law does not require that a short statement be included with each display like the law in Stone, nothing prevents a public school from including a more robust context statement explaining the historical and legal importance of the Ten Commandments. Any of these hypothetical displays allowed under Arkansas’s law would implicate Stone’s carve-out permitting the Ten Commandments to be used in public schools “in an appropriate study of history, civilization, comparative religion, or the like.” 449 U.S. at 42.

The challengers to Arkansas’s law might respond that, textually speaking, the Kentucky law considered in Stone likewise allowed these diverse displays. But that is beside the point. Stone did not consider those potential applications of Kentucky’s law. That is likely because Stone arose before the Supreme Court’s seminal decision setting a firm line between facial and as-applied challenges. United States v. Salerno, 481 U.S. 739, 746 (1987) (holding that a facial challenge requires “no set of circumstances under which the Act would be valid”). Through modern eyes, Stone is best understood as resolving only an as-applied challenge to Kentucky’s law—specifically, to a standalone Ten Commandments display. See Gillian E. Metzger, Facial Challenges and Federalism, 105 Colum. L. Rev. 873, 882 (2005) (“[U]ntil Salerno uprooted the traditional orthodoxy, facial challenges were understood to include such context-specific challenges to general rules because as-applied challenges were defined in fairly narrow terms synonymous with claims of privilege.”).

Understood this way, Stone at most could support an as-applied challenge to Arkansas’s law. The challengers’ burden in this facial challenge is to show that every way that an Arkansas public school might comply with the Ten Commandments law violates the Establishment Clause. See Salerno, 481 U.S. at 746. Put differently, the challengers’ decision to bring a facial challenge to Arkansas’s law “comes at a cost.” See Moody v. NetChoice, 603 U.S. 707, 723 (2024). That cost is that Stone cannot be dispositive. Even accepting Stone on its terms, the decision does not require sustaining a facial challenge to a law like Arkansas’s that allows Ten Commandments displays that are in line with Stone.

II. While Lemon was good law, Stone became an outlier.

Even before the Supreme Court overturned Lemon, Stone did not age well as a judicial precedent. Following Stone, the Supreme Court distinguished it again and again, each time giving it less reach. This Court has done much the same.

A. The Supreme Court’s narrowing of Stone began shortly after its issuance. Not even three years later, the Supreme Court rejected an Establishment Clause challenge to a state legislature’s “practice of opening each legislative day with a prayer by a chaplain paid by the State.” Marsh v. Chambers, 463 U.S. 783, 784, 795 (1983). The majority did not once cite Stone. Nor did it apply Lemon. Both failures drew the ire of the principal dissent. Invoking Stone, the dissent found it “self-evident” that the “‘purpose’ of legislative prayer is preeminently religious rather than secular.” Id. at 797 & n.4 (Brennan, J., dissenting). As to Lemon, the dissent criticized the Court for “mak[ing] no pretense of subjecting Nebraska’s practice of legislative prayer” to that “formal ‘test[].’”⁴ Id. at 796. In short, out of the gate, Stone’s holding and methodology carried no weight.

Things did not improve for Stone after Marsh. In Lynch v. Donnelly, the Supreme Court held that a municipality could display a “Nativity scene[] in its annual Christmas display.” 465 U.S. 668, 670–71, 687 (1984). Whereas Stone treated Lemon as the end-all-be-all, Lynch countered that “we have repeatedly emphasized our unwillingness to be confined to any single test or criterion in this sensitive area.” Id. at 679. In fact, the Court admitted that in two recent cases (one of which was Marsh) it “did not even apply the Lemon ‘test.’” Id. As to Stone, Lynch understood the case to stand for the slim proposition that the Ten Commandments displays there were problematic because they “were posted purely as a religious admonition” or “were motivated wholly by religious considerations.” See id. at 679, 680. Taking Lynch at its word, Stone governs only if the posting of the Ten Commandments is “wholly” or “purely” motivated by religious considerations. Any secular rationale, even in part, suffices to distinguish Stone.

The Supreme Court finished its narrowing of Stone in a pair of 2005 decisions, each of which considered a Ten Commandments display on public property. In the first decision, the Supreme Court characterized Stone as involving extreme facts: It was an “unusual case[]” in which there was either “an apparent sham” by the government or a secular purpose for the statute that was “secondary.” McCreary Cnty. v. Am. Civ. Liberties Union of Ky., 545 U.S. 844, 865 (2005). As the Court saw it, Stone turned on the “isolated exhibition” of the Ten Commandments “not leav[ing] room even for an argument that secular education explained their being there.” Id. at 867. Stone, the Court clarified, “did not purport to decide the constitutionality of every possible way the Commandments might be set out by the government, and under the Establishment Clause detail is key.”⁵ Id. So under McCreary County, Stone stands at most for the limited proposition that a standalone Ten Commandments display can raise constitutional concerns. Am. Civil Liberties Union of Ky. v. Mercer Cnty., 432 F.3d 624, 634 (6th Cir. 2005) (“Whatever is left of Stone is limited to circumstances involving public displays of the Ten Commandments in isolation.”). Indeed, although McCreary County considered three different Ten Commandments displays in a courthouse, it cited Stone only while considering the one in which the Ten Commandments were displayed alone. 545 U.S. at 868–73.

The second Supreme Court decision from 2005 hemmed in Stone even more. As noted above, in Van Orden, the Supreme Court rejected an Establishment Clause challenge to the placement of a monument of the Ten Commandments on the grounds of the Texas state Capitol. 545 U.S. at 681 (plurality op.). In so doing, the plurality found

⁵ The Supreme Court made a similar point about Stone nearly 20 years earlier. Edwards v. Aguillard, 482 U.S. 578, 593–94 (1987) (observing that Stone “did not mean that no use could ever be made of the Ten Commandments, or that the Ten Commandments played an exclusively religious role in the history of Western Civilization”).

Lemon “not useful in dealing with the sort of passive monument that Texas has erected on its Capitol grounds.” Id. at 686 (emphasis added); see also id. at 703–04 (Breyer, J., concurring in the judgment) (likewise not relying on Lemon). It is hard to imagine a more direct repudiation of Stone’s methodology. To Stone, Lemon was everything. To Van Orden, Lemon was irrelevant to the constitutionality of a Ten Commandments display on public property.

Rather than apply Lemon, the Van Orden plurality focused on “the nature of the monument” and “our Nation’s history.” Id. at 686. In undertaking this analysis, the Court pointed out the obvious: “[A]cknowledgements [on public property] of the role played by the Ten Commandments in our Nation’s heritage are common throughout America.” Id. at 688 (emphasis added). As evidence, the Court noted that the Ten Commandments are displayed several places in its own building. The Decalogue appears with Moses in the Supreme Court’s “own Courtroom”; it “adorn[s]” the gates on both sides of the Courtroom and the “doors leading into the Courtroom”; and “Moses . . . sits on the exterior east facade of the building holding the Ten Commandments tablets.” Id. And the Supreme Court’s building is no exception when compared to other government buildings in our Nation’s capital. Id. at 689 (“Similar acknowledgements can be seen throughout a visitor’s tour of our Nation’s Capital.”). The Supreme Court later affirmed that “[i]n Van Orden and McCreary, no Member of the Court thought that these depictions [of the Ten Commandments] are unconstitutional.” Am. Legion, 588 U.S. at 53.

Against this backdrop of Ten Commandments displays “common throughout America,” the Van Orden plurality turned to Stone. And it made short work of the decision. See Mercer Cnty., 432 F.3d at 634 (noting that Van Orden “simply dismissed Stone as inapplicable”). Van Orden did note that Stone arose in the “classroom context.” 545 U.S. at 690 (plurality op.). But the plurality did not suggest that the Ten Commandments can never be displayed or used in public schools. Stone itself refutes such an implication. 449 U.S. at 42. In fact, the Van Orden plurality emphasized that nothing “suggest[s] that Stone would extend to displays of the Ten Commandments that lack a ‘plainly religious,’ ‘pre-eminent purpose.’” 545 U.S. at 691 n.11 (citation omitted). In other words, the Van Orden plurality dismissed Stone as a case in which the displays contained not even a hint of a secular purpose. See id. That can only be a rare circumstance. After all, in nearly the same breath, the Van Orden plurality held that “the Ten Commandments have an undeniable historical meaning” and that “[s]imply having religious content or promoting a message consistent with a religious doctrine does not run afoul of the Establishment Clause.” Id. at 690.

In the two decades since McCreary County and Van Orden, the Supreme Court has not cited Stone again in a majority decision. Stone simply goes unmentioned in the Court’s modern Establishment Clause jurisprudence. This is true even when the Court discusses Ten Commandments displays. Most notably, Stone did not make an appearance in the governing decision in American Legion, despite the Court explaining that the Ten Commandments “have historical significance as one of the foundations of our legal system, and for largely that reason, they are depicted in the marble frieze in our courtroom and in other prominent buildings in our Nation’s capital.” 558 U.S. at 53.

As this summary shows, Stone did not fare well in the Supreme Court even while Lemon was good law. Stone’s methodology for considering the constitutionality of a Ten Commandments display lost the day in Van Orden. See 545 U.S. at 686 (plurality op.); id. at 703–04 (Breyer, J., concurring in the judgment). And over time, Stone became a one-off decision that applied only in extreme circumstances. In the words of McCreary County, Stone was an “unusual case[]” in which the “isolated exhibition [of the Ten Commandments] did not leave room even for an argument that secular education explained their being there.” 545 U.S. at 865, 867. Thus, even while Lemon was on the books, Stone became a vanishing precedent.

B. This Court has rightly followed the Supreme Court’s lead in not extending Stone. Two decades ago, the en banc Court refused to apply Lemon in rejecting an Establishment Clause challenge to placing a Ten Commandments monument in a Nebraska city park. ACLU Neb. Found. v. City of Plattsmouth, 419 F.3d 772, 778 n.8 (8th Cir. 2005) (en banc). “Taking [its] cue from Chief Justice Rehnquist’s opinion” and Justice Breyer’s concurrence in Van Orden, a 10-judge majority focused on our Nation’s “heritage,” not Lemon’s test, to allow the city to display the Ten Commandments monument. Id. at 775–77, 778 n.8. It reasoned that “[a]lthough the text of the Ten Commandments has undeniable religious significance, simply having religious content or promoting a message consistent with a religious doctrine does not run afoul of the Establishment Clause.” Id. at 778 (cleaned up) (citation omitted). The sole mention of Stone was to note that the Van Orden plurality distinguished it. Id. at 776. Indeed, Judge Bye’s dissent did not invoke Stone.

In 2014, this Court again refused to apply Lemon. Red River Freethinkers v. City of Fargo, 764 F.3d 948, 949 (8th Cir. 2014). Over Judge Bye’s dissent invoking Lemon, the Court held that a “passive display of the Ten Commandments on public land is evaluated by the standard in Van Orden, which found Lemon ‘not useful.’” Id. at 949 (cleaned up) (internal citations omitted). The Court applied Van Orden and this Court’s en banc decision in City of Plattsmouth to allow the display of a Ten Commandments monument on a city plaza that shows “other symbols, such as the American flag and an ‘allseeing eye’ within a pyramid.” Id. at 949–50. Neither the majority nor the dissent cited Stone.

Four years later, this Court effectively interred Lemon. See New Doe Child #1 v. United States, 901 F.3d 1015, 1019–21 (8th Cir. 2018). In that case, the plaintiffs challenged the placement of “In God We Trust” on United States currency. Id. at 1018. The Court noted that Establishment Clause jurisprudence “[o]ver the last half century” is convoluted because “the Supreme Court has adopted numerous tests to interpret the Establishment Clause, without committing to any one.” Id. at 1019. The Court resolved this confusion by applying the history-driven test from Town of Greece v. Galloway, 572 U.S. 565 (2014), which was the Supreme Court’s “most recent direction.” Id. at 1019–20. As the Court emphasized, “[i]n Galloway, the Supreme Court offered an unequivocal directive: The Establishment Clause must be interpreted by reference to historical practices and understandings.” Id. at 1020 (cleaned up) (citation omitted). And the Court underscored that Galloway’s “historical approach is not limited to a particular factual context.” Id. Although the Court noted that some implications of this doctrinal “shift are not yet clear,” id. at 1021, Kennedy later vindicated this Court’s reading of Galloway. As Kennedy put it (quoting Galloway), “[i]n place of Lemon and the endorsement test, this Court has instructed that the Establishment Clause must be interpreted by ‘reference to historical practices and understandings.’” 597 U.S. at 535 (citation omitted). In short, this Court rightly applied a history-driven inquiry rather than Lemon.

III. Now that Lemon has been abrogated, Stone should not be applied here.

Although Stone had little import before Lemon was overruled, Stone has no applicability here now that Lemon is no more. The Supreme Court left no doubt that Lemon has been “abrogated.” Groff, 600 U.S. at 460 & n.7. Over three years ago, the Court emphasized that it “long ago abandoned Lemon and its endorsement test offshoot.” Kennedy, 597 U.S. at 534. Going forward, Lemon is no longer an appropriate test to interpret the Establishment Clause. Indeed, as noted above, that is nothing new in this circuit. See New Doe Child #1, 901 F.3d at 1019–21; Red River Freethinkers, 764 F.3d at 949–50; City of Plattsmouth, 419 F.3d at 778 & n.8.

That Lemon has been abrogated raises the question of how to treat a Supreme Court precedent like Stone that rests on Lemon and nothing else. No doubt, this Court cannot itself overrule a Supreme Court precedent. Some action by the Supreme Court is required. To quote the well-known rule, “[i]f a precedent of [the Supreme] Court has direct application in a case, yet appears to rest on reasons rejected in some other line of decisions, the Court of Appeals should follow the case which directly controls, leaving to [the Supreme] Court the prerogative of overruling its own decisions.” Rodriguez de Quijas v. Shearson/Am. Express, Inc., 490 U.S. 477, 484 (1989).

The district court determined that “[t]his case begins and ends with Stone.” Stinson, 798 F. Supp. 3d at 948. That conclusion fails on several levels. Even before Lemon was upended, the Supreme Court had hollowed out Stone. And in the context of this facial challenge, Arkansas’s law is by no means a carbon copy of the law in Stone. As noted above, Arkansas’s law allows a Ten Commandments display that is situated alongside other documents formative to American history and law. In other words, a Ten Commandments display in Arkansas need not look anything like the “isolated exhibition” considered in Stone. See McCreary Cnty., 545 U.S. at 867.

These potential differences in how Arkansas’s law could be applied prove up a simple point: Stone is not on all fours in the context of this facial challenge. To apply Stone to Arkansas’s law would require extending the decision. The Court should decline to extend Stone to these new circumstances. Although a court of appeals cannot declare a Supreme Court decision to be overruled based on its weakened foundations, Rodriguez de Quijas, 490 U.S. at 484, this rule does not bind a circuit court to extend a discredited precedent like Stone. “[T]he prudent course for an inferior court . . . is to hew closely to the [Supreme] Court’s specific, contemporary guidance.” See New Doe Child #1, 901 F.3d at 1019–20 (citation omitted). In fact, the Supreme Court recently declined to “extend” a decision that “sits uneasily with the [Constitution’s] terms, original meaning, and our precedents.” City of Grants Pass v. Johnson, 603 U.S. 520, 549–50 (2024). As a result, the Court need not ignore Stone’s lack of jurisprudential footing. It should treat Stone’s status as a poorly reasoned outlier whose methodology has been discredited as a reason not to extend it. Rather than extend Stone an inch farther, the Court should apply the test mandated by Kennedy.

Although the Court need not decide whether Stone remains good law in the context of this facial challenge, the best view is that the Supreme Court has in fact overturned Stone. To be sure, the Supreme Court has not said the magic words “Stone is overruled.” The Supreme Court, however, left no question as to Lemon’s demise. As of 2022, the Supreme Court had “long ago abandoned Lemon.” Kennedy, 597 U.S. at 534. And the year after, the Supreme Court confirmed that Lemon is “abrogated.” Groff, 600 U.S. at 460 & n.7.

When the Supreme Court overruled Lemon, it rejected Lemon’s methodology for interpreting the Establishment Clause. In Kennedy, the Supreme Court weighed the lower court’s reliance on Lemon “and its progeny.” 597 U.S. at 534 (emphasis added). Of course, Stone is part of Lemon’s progeny, given that Stone is all about Lemon. And Kennedy swept broadly in rejecting Lemon’s application to any Establishment Clause challenge. As Kennedy put it, Lemon “invited chaos in lower courts, led to differing results in materially identical cases, and created a minefield for legislators.” Id. (cleaned up) (citation omitted). So Kennedy can only be understood as an across-the-board purge of Lemon from Establishment Clause jurisprudence. American Legion similarly discussed the intractable problems with Lemon across “a great array of laws and practices.” 588 U.S. at 49 (plurality op.); accord Galloway, 572 U.S. at 575–77. These sweeping, categorical holdings about Lemon’s shortcomings cannot help but sweep up a case like Stone that rests only on Lemon. The same is true of Kennedy’s unambiguous directive that going forward courts applying the Establishment Clause “must” focus on our Nation’s history. 597 U.S. at 535–36 (emphasis added). That broad mandate leaves no room for a Lemon-driven precedent like Stone. See Firewalker-Fields v. Lee, 58 F.4th 104, 121 n.5 (4th Cir. 2023) (“[I]t is now clear that Lemon and its ilk are not good law.”).

CONCLUSION
